

Once the CP construction crews crossed the Sierra Nevada in 1868, they had much easier building across the valleys of Nevada.

The original CP grade in northwestern Nevada now has welded double track. Although railroad construction in the Nevada valleys was relatively easy, the route did have to snake its way around the north-south trending mountains, such as the 8,000-foot Toano Range behind this eastbound train.